

Sharing Jesus in Mongolia

Iobal Mission pioneer Bumchin Erdenebat and his wife, Bolormaa, live on top of one of the many bare hills in Mongolia's capital, through the wooden door, I was greeted by an ornately carved wooden structure. An octagonal skylight let in a soft glow that Ulaanbaatar. The entire hill is covered in brightly colored houses and traditional yurts. The steep, deeply rutted roads, which are nearly unnavigable in the winter, seemed nearly as slippery with mud in the summer rain.

When I arrived, the Sabbath School program was just beginning. The yurt church was plain white on the outside, but when I stepped illuminated the interior beautifully. A flat screen TV and sound system for playing music occupied the front area. A dozen children in Pathfinder uniforms were singing at the top of their lungs, and more and more children as well as adults streamed in through the door as the program progressed.

Bolormaa told Bible stories that held the attention of the children—and adults as well. Even though she spoke in Mongolian, of which I understood not one word, it was obvious to me that she has a gift for ministry. That's why, when I asked Bumchin how he started planting this church, I was not surprised when he said that his wife did it.

It started back in 2012. He had a well-paying job in human resources for a construction company. Bolormaa was at home with the children, and she wanted to create a better community for them among the children who lived nearby. So, she started a

The joy on the children's faces tells everything one needs to know about children's Bible time, which quickly became popular among both the children and the adults because of her enthusiasm, creativity, and wonderful storytelling.

The couple used to attend the Central Adventist church in Ulaanbaatar. As their neighborhood children became more a part of their lives, they took them along. That soon became a problem, however, because the car could fit only so many children. The solution, they decided, was to open a branch Sabbath School in their home. Quickly the weekly services filled, and the parents often attended with their children, which led to a full-fledged Pathfinder club and then to complete church services.

The Mongolia Mission president noted what was happening and invited Bumchin to guit his job with the construction company and become a Global Mission pioneer. Now, Bumchin spends his days in full-time ministry to the community around him.

Bumchin and Bolormaa are developing their property into a community center with a basketball court, a playground, and a traditional Mongolian yurt that serves as a Sabbath School, church, and overall meeting place. And they have many plans to continue expanding.

Since Bumchin and Bolormaa started their work in the community, they have baptized 47 people. They are a model church-planting team, connecting with their community in positive ways, meeting felt needs in the community, and then inviting them to accept Jesus as their Savior. The people are responding, and the church is growing in Mongolia.

Dear Friend

n this issue of Frontline is a story about a mission project you are helping to fund in Mongolia. You may remember when, not many years ago, the first Adventist convert was baptized in Mongolia. Now the church has taken root and has even started sending missionaries.

It's a little bit of a misnomer to talk about the first Adventist convert in Mongolia being baptized only a few years ago. The truth is that the Adventist Church was growing in Mongolia long ago. It's just that it died, and we had to start over. If we're honest with ourselves, the same thing is happening in other places. Territories that had once been taken for Christ are being lost again. There's no doubt about it; we are in the thick of a great controversy between good and evil, and evil still wins sometimes. Fortunately, we know that good will ultimately triumph, and we have the incredible privilege of participating in that victory through our prayers, personal witness, and giving to those who are working among unreached people groups. Evidently, you understand that privilege because you care enough about God's mission to be reading Frontline.

If you are a regular contributor to Global Mission projects, thank you! If you are not a regular contributor, please consider becoming one. It is your gifts to God's mission to unreached people that make possible stories like Bumchin and Bolormaa's. Because people like you have generously given money that has been put to work in Mongolia, there is now a Mongolian yurt standing on the windy top of a crowded hill in Ulaanbaatar; and it is filled with people worshiping the God of heaven, many of them for the first time in their lives. Thank you! God bless,
